| | car. They live together, but she didn't pay for anything this time. They then went and got gas | took her with her car (but she usually goes with her car if she were to go in person) | | | stock up so only grabbed veggies/frozen meals, some swiffer pads | | | its suggested items (things ordered last or viewed most); bought only for themself | bought only for herself | bought only for herself | bought only for himself |
| P1: 7 | Yes, since there are a lot of them in the house, for things that they all eat, they buy big sizes (rice, eggs). She buys small sizes only if she's buying for herself | Based on how much she knows she would eat, not based on price. Package size doesn't determine anything for her. | Yes, usually buy the value size to split among the roommates and is cheaper | Usually buys the value size if it wont expire anytime soon since that is cheaper even if not sharing with anyone | Buys large amounts to minimize how often they have to stock up. Focus on buying items with minimal waste like lots of plastic/card board packaging | - | | Buys store brand unless it's bad(after trying it once). Buys small weekly amounts since they don't like freezing, even though bulk is cheaper | Based on how fast she'll eat it before it goes bad; talked about switching from buying gallon milk to the skinny carton (1L) the gallon goes bad faster | Based on spoilage; switched to skinny milk cartons; buys meat in bulk and freezes it | Big sizes (Costco); works because roommates split perishables; prefers small vegetable packs |
| P1: 8 | Only gets what they need and buys bigger sizes | nothing | Buy value size stuff | Nothing much, try to bus instead of taking an uber | Very little focus on it, convenience and locally made is priority | - | | Walmart for price, store brand, $9/month delivery pass, meal prep. Bulk would be cheaper but costs too much up front | Buys smaller sizes to avoid waste | Bulk meat from Costco, smaller milk | Costco prices + splitting with roommates |
